

Simulated Presence Therapy

Carers, whether they are family members or nursing staff, deal with a number of disruptive behaviours from people with dementia on a daily basis. Successful management of such behaviours is important to the well being of the person with dementia and their carers.

Simulated presence therapy seeks to provide comfort to the person with dementia by altering their environment. Findings have suggested that when reminiscences were given by a main family carer it was possible to provide a calming effect.

The goal is to create an environment for the person, that includes the people and experiences best loved by them over the course of a life time. Previously audio tapes have been used for this procedure but we have developed DVD's which are proving very successful.
